SSA Inspector General Report Exposes New Allegation of Illegal DOGE Data Usage

A whistleblower complaint filed in January claims that a former Department of Government Efficiency (DOGE) employee had unfettered access to Social Security Administration (SSA) data, kept his work laptop and credentials after he stopped working at the agency, and stored sensitive information on a thumb drive in order to share it with his private employer, according to a new report from the Social Security Administration Inspector General's office.

The former DOGE software engineer allegedly told co-workers he had the highest level of access to the "Numident" and "Master Death File" databases, which contain SSA records for more than 500 million Americans. He also asked for help transferring the data from a thumb drive to his personal computer so he could sanitize it and use it at a private company he was slated to join. When one co-worker refused to help, he said he expected to receive a presidential pardon if authorities found him guilty of illegal behavior.

"Anyone involved in this incident must be held accountable to the fullest extent of the law. Congress and the Social Security Inspector General must move quickly to get the facts and ensure bad actors are punished," said Robert Roach, Jr., President of the Alliance.

"Allegations that a 'DOGE bro' may have removed highly sensitive Social Security data onto a thumb drive should set off alarm bells across the country," said Richard Fiesta, Alliance Executive Director. "If these reports are accurate, it is a stunning, illegal data security breach. Americans deserve timely, honest answers about what happened, whose information may have been exposed, and what will be done to protect them going forward."

Events in Albany and Elmont, New York Draw Attention to Online Scams Targeting Seniors and the Alliance's Work to Fight Back

On Wednesday, the New York State Alliance (NYSARA) held a press conference at the state capitol to demand action from state legislators and announce a series of educational events to educate seniors and their loved ones about AI-powered social media scams. Watch highlights from the press conference here.

NYSARA President Barry Kaufmann introduced speakers and shared stories of members' firsthand experience with scams. NYS Senate Aging Committee Chair and Senator Cordell Cleare, New York State Office of Aging (NYSOFA) and former NYSARA Executive Director Greg Olsen, Executive Director of the NYS Association on Aging Rebecca Preve, Dan Lyon from Lifespan of Rochester, and Alliance consultant Marissa Whitehouse all spoke at the event.

“As chair of the Aging Committee in the Senate, I have long carried bills to create an elder justice task force and to freeze funds with regards to suspicious financial transactions. The time for these bills to become law is now backed by increased funding to trusted community partners to focus on prevention,” said Senator Cleare. “It is heartless, offensive, cowardly, and unconscionable that people would take advantage of older New Yorkers through scams, including those facilitated by technology. Our elders took care of us, and now it's our duty to take care of them.”

New York State Attorney General Letitia James participated in a listening session sponsored by the Alliance, NYSARA, and other organizations on Thursday. Four seniors who were victims of social media scams shared their stories, and Joan Perlini, VP of the Long Island NYSARA chapter, asked James why victims are left with no recourse when the scam occurs online versus other platforms like banks. The attorney general noted that federal law only regulates banking scams and encouraged New Yorkers to contact her office if they are victims of a scam. You can watch the livestream of the event here.

“Senior fraud is not new, but artificial intelligence and social media have supercharged online scams into a multibillion dollar industry,” said President Roach. “That’s why we’re proud to launch our ‘Stop the Scam’ campaign in New York and across the country.”

New Report Reveals the True Cost of Online Consumer Scams

On Wednesday, the Consumer Federation of America (CFA) released "The Scam Economy," a report examining the prevalence of online consumer scams in the United States. The numbers are staggering: The report estimates that Americans lose an average of $119 billion to online scams each year, more than seven times higher than previously estimated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI). Meta platforms are fertile ground for these scams, 57 percent of which take place on Facebook alone.

Older Americans are especially vulnerable to online scams, particularly on social media. The report also finds that seniors, while more susceptible to scams, are less likely to report them to authorities, meaning that the true scale is unknown.

However, data does show that seniors are losing significantly more money to scams each year, doubling in one year alone between 2021 and 2022.

"This report shows just how out of control these scams are," said Joseph Peters, Jr., Secretary-Treasurer of the Alliance. "Education alone cannot solve a problem that is operating on an industrial level. We need legislators and regulators to create more powerful safeguards and demand greater accountability from the technology platforms that allow scams to spread."

KFF Health News: Medicare Advantage 'Dark Money' Group Attempts To Win Higher Payments for Insurance Companies

By Fred Schulte and Maia Rosenfeld and David Hilzenrath

Judging by more than 16,400 comments recently posted on a federal government website, you'd think there was a groundswell of older Americans demanding that federal officials hike payments to their Medicare Advantage health insurance plans.

Yet about 82% of the comments are identical to a letter that appeared on the website of a secretive advocacy group called Medicare Advantage Majority, a data analysis by KFF Health News has found.

The “dark money” group does not reveal its funders or much else — other than to say it is “dedicated to protecting and strengthening Medicare Advantage” and is “powered by hundreds of thousands of local advocates nationwide.”
